CHRIS JONES RISK MANAGEMENT

Let's talk about due diligence

There can be massive financial penalties on your organisation for breaches of the Occupational Health and Safety legislation. A failure to control workers compensation costs will certainly impose a substantial burden.

Are your managers and directors aware of the potential fines and imprisonment that they can face?

Due diligence demands a pro-active approach to Occupational Health and Safety. It is not enough to establish a policy. There must be systems in place to ensure that policies and procedures are implemented at all levels within the organisation.

Establishing an Occupational Health and Safety programme

The process is simple. First we survey your current programme. We identify what is required to meet your objectives.

Then we work with your management and employees to implement an effective safety programme.

We train your management, supervisors, and employees.

We establish systems to monitor the results, and ensure that workers compensation costs are effectively controlled.

Once the programme is in place, we can establish how we are to maintain it through continuous improvement and regular auditing.

“Mostly we just need some advice....”

We can provide: ongoing safety coaching and mentoring for your management, site inspections, management briefings, manual preparation, and workers compensation claims management assistance.

Training your staff

We can conduct a training needs analysis, and design training packages to meet the specific needs of your organisation, for your industry. We offer induction training, supervisor training, management training and specialised in-house training programmes for management and supervisors.

Public safety and contractors

We can provide public safety programmes and staff training, and establish effective systems and controls to minimise the exposure to liability claims from sub-contractors and third parties.
